In a major breakthrough in speech recognition, researchers at Microsoft claim to have developed the first technology that recognises the words in a conversation as well as humans do.

A team of researchers and engineers in Microsoft Artificial Intelligence and Research created a speech recognition system that makes the same or fewer errors than professional transcriptionists.

They reported a word error rate (WER) of 5.9%, down from the 6.3% WER the team reported just last month.

The 5.9% error rate is about equal to that of people who were asked to transcribe the same conversation, and it is the lowest ever recorded against the industry standard Switchboard speech recognition task.

"We've reached human parity. This is a historic achievement," Xuedong Huang, the company's chief speech scientist said in a blog post. The milestone means that, for the first time, a computer can recognise the words in a conversation as well as a person would. In doing so, the team beat a goal they set less than a year ago—and greatly exceeded everyone else's expectations as well.

The research milestone comes after decades of research in speech recognition, beginning in the early 1970s with DARPA, the US agency tasked with making technology breakthroughs.

Over the decades, most major technology companies and many research organisations
